At the time of the lecture, the author had not yet ascended to Senior Counsel status.

A INTRODUCTION

At the outset, let me declare a professional role that I played in the early stages of what has become an unedifying muckraking among senior members of the judiciary. I led a team that represented the Judge President at the Judicial Service Commission (“the JSC”) in 2009. At issue was a collective complaint by all the Justices of the Constitutional Court against the Judge President, alleging that he had attempted improperly to influence the Court in a case involving he who is now, for his many sins, President of the country.

In its decision, the JSC found that the Judge President’s conduct, while “unwise, ill-considered, imprudent and not thought through”, none the less did not constitute impeachable conduct.

An NGO called Freedom under Law (buoyed by the ebullient rhetoric of a former Justice of the Constitutional Court particularly in matters concerning the Judge President) felt aggrieved by this decision as it wanted the JSC to investigate the complaint against the Judge President thoroughly, including allowing the testing of evidence through cross-examination of the Justices and the Judge President. So, it proceeded to the High Court, failed, and then to the Supreme Court of Appeal which set aside the decision of the JSC.

Not to be outdone, the Premier of the Western Cape spotted an opportunity to joust at the sword and mounted a steed in the form of the principle of legality. In lay parlance, she claimed that the JSC was not properly constituted when it made the decision to, as it were, acquit the Judge President. The Supreme Court of Appeal obliged her.

Since the JSC is a constitutional body (established by s 178 of the Constitution) and its decision as regards the fitness or otherwise of a judge is a decision that is rooted in the Constitution (pursuant to s 177(1)(a) read with 178(6) thereof) the Judge President sought succour from the wounding observations of the Supreme Court of Appeal<sup>2</sup> in what he hoped would be the palliative jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, otherwise constituted than by its permanent members who were (and continue to be) his adversaries in a gross misconduct complaint to the JSC.

One would have thought it a basic requirement of the rules of natural justice, that those Constitutional Court Justices who had lodged a complaint of gross misconduct against the Judge President would automatically disqualify themselves from hearing his appeal. But the Judge President’s hope proved a forlorn hope in this regard. A Constitutional Court bench, including three of the Justices who had lodged a complaint of gross misconduct against him, considered his application for leave to appeal and refused it.<sup>3</sup>

The effect of this judgment is that the merits of the gross misconduct complaint by the Justices of the Constitutional Court against the Judge President may have to be investigated, again, by the JSC. If Freedom under Law has its wish, both the Justices on the one hand, and the Judge President on the other, will be subjected to robust cross-examination. Of course, the electronic and print media will not miss the opportunity to beam and cover such a spectacle for their audience and readership – not to mention the increased advertising revenue that they would gain from the popularity of such judicial muckraking.

But for our purposes tonight, the rub lies not in the media’s motives in broadcasting or

<sup>3</sup> Because I was not on brief in that matter, and the issues it raises are not the merits of the complaint for which I was on brief, I consider it perfectly permissible within the Rules of the Bar to offer an unsolicited view on this case.

covering a public judicial spat. It lies rather in the unusual spectacle of judges of the highest court deciding the fate of another senior judge in circumstances where they have a direct and substantial interest in the outcome of their own complaint that they have now sent back to the JSC for, effectively, trial. Nemo iudex in sua causa debet<sup>4</sup> seems to have meant little in this context.

By what Rule of Law did the Constitutional Court, comprising in its number three Justices who want the Judge President impeached, manage to play referee in the qualifying round match in order to be player at the knock-out stage against the same guy? None, I would suggest to you.

B THE CONUNDRUM

I have written many judgments as an Acting Judge of the High Court and of the Labour Court. In some I have granted applications for leave to appeal. In others I have refused such applications. Not one of my judgments has thus far been set aside on appeal.

Having thus shamelessly blown my horn, I can now tell you this: Every lawyer worthy of his or her robe knows that the most basic consideration in applications for leave to appeal is prospects of success on appeal. The traditional standard is whether there are reasonable prospects of another Court reaching a different conclusion. If the prospects are poor, the judge will not grant leave. If they are reasonable, leave will be granted.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>4</sup> No one may be judge in one's own cause or, as the sporting among us would put it, you cannot be a player and a referee in the same match.

<sup>5</sup> Well, there are exceptions, such as where success on appeal will in any event be academic, or the order a brutum fulmen (incapable of enforcement). Courts do not like granting orders that are, for some reason, incapable of enforcement.

<sup>6</sup> See paras [44] and [45]. I pause here to say that had I been arguing the application, I would have advised my client not to

The Constitutional Court managed to avoid dealing with the application for leave to appeal in this normal way, electing rather to invoke the parties' acquiescence in its deciding the application without considering prospects of success on the merits. Alive to the conundrum it was about to navigate, it chose the Pontius Pilate route in these words:

"The parties agree that it is necessary for us to consider the applications.... But consideration of the applications for leave to appeal, by virtue of the concession by the parties that it is necessary for us to determine them, does not mean that we should determine the outcome of the applications as we would normally have. We should do so only to the extent that it is necessary to avoid injustice"<sup>6</sup>

What then follows is reasoning that I find altogether strange and unconvincing. The Constitutional Court, clearly in a spot of bother, decided to refuse leave to appeal on the basis of what it says is a consideration of a difficult balance between its obligation to provide finality in the matter on the one hand, and procedural fairness and, thereby, the avoidance of injustice to the Judge President, on the other. In its own words, it said:

"[46] A balance needs to be struck between the Court's obligation to provide finality in this matter (as it would be acquiesce in a Constitutional Court comprising justices who want him impeached to hear and determine the application for leave to appeal. I would then have persisted in all of them disqualifying themselves automatically by reason of their obvious interest in the outcome of the application and appeal, thus forcing a decision out of them refusing to disqualify themselves despite my client's protestations. This would, in my estimation, have brought the crisis to a head.

intolerable to have a case pending indefinitely) [on the one hand] and possible injustice to the applicant [on the other]. These factors weigh heavily in determining the extent to which it is in the interests of justice to enter into the merits, and thus whether to grant leave to appeal.

to preserve the fairness of its own processes.”

And thus the curtain fell for the Judge President. Ironically (and perhaps even sardonically in light of the Justices of the Constitutional Court being complainants against the Judge President in pending impeachment proceedings at the JSC) this reasoning was ostensibly made to save him from an injustice!

[47] All the parties were in agreement that this matter cannot remain pending. There is a need for finality. This was not disputed. In determining the extent to which we should consider the merits, regard must be had to whether substantial injustice will be done to the applicant should this Court refuse to grant leave to appeal. The underlying right which the applicant seeks to protect on final instance to this Court is, importantly, a procedural one: the rejection of that right will result in the continuance of a process only and will not result, without more, in a finding against him on the substance of the complaint. What is more, the applicant has had the benefit of an appeal. These considerations mitigate the threat of injustice.

C AN UNHAPPY REASONING

The reasoning is, with respect, not the best.

The right that the Judge President sought to protect was not “a procedural one” as the Constitutional Court asserts. It was, among others, a substantive and constitutionally entrenched right to a fair hearing before an impartial forum (s 34 of the Constitution). Being complainants against him in a process that could culminate in his ignominious removal as a judge, at least three of the Justices of the Constitutional Court who dismissed his application for leave to appeal can hardly be said to be impartial. Their own belief that they considered the application impartially is irrelevant because they clearly have an interest in their complaint being investigated (and, they would undoubtedly hope, found to have merit) by the JSC.

[48] In addition, although the parties have consented to the conflicted Judges’ sitting in the present matter, regard must still be had to the fact that they would ordinarily have to recuse themselves. For this reason, this Court should deny leave to appeal

The Judge President did not have “the benefit of an appeal” as the Constitutional Court asserts at paragraph [47] because, having dismissed his application for leave to appeal, the Constitutional Court did not hear the merits of his appeal. A suggestion that he had the benefit of an appeal in the Supreme Court of Appeal would be misplaced for at least two reasons. First, he was the respondent in the Supreme Court of Appeal. It was the appellants, namely, Freedom under Law and the Western Cape Premier, that had the benefit of an appeal. Secondly, since the case implicated constitutional rights, one cannot validly say a litigant in such a case has had the benefit of an appeal in a lower court than the Constitutional Court. It is the Constitutional Court that is the highest court in all constitutional matters. Having refused to consider the merits of the Judge President's assertion of those rights, the Constitutional Court failed in its duty and cannot by any stretch of imagination claim that the Judge President has nonetheless had the benefit of an appeal.

In any event, the benefit of an appeal (if he had had one) is no bar to a substantively fair and impartial hearing. To hold otherwise demonstrates that the Constitutional Court's view is that the Judge President's s 34 right is merely procedural. How substantive fairness can be considered merely a procedural issue is a novel ideal as any labour lawyer will tell you.

What's more, the Constitutional Court's refusal of leave to appeal did not bring the matter to finality. On the contrary, by sending the matter back to the JSC for trial, the Constitutional Court paved the way for a public spectacle that can only do harm not only to the institution that is the Constitutional Court but also possibly to the JSC. The general public, taking its cue from lawyers who should know better and politicians whose sole purpose is air time in the media, have already criticised the JSC, unfairly, for shirking its responsibility.

It is in fact the JSC's decision that brought the matter to finality. Following that decision, one of the complainant Justices said he considered the matter finalised by the JSC and that "it would not be wise for anyone to reopen the matter". In this regard, Justice Jafta said:

"I think the matter has done so much damage to the judiciary, and to this Commission as an institution as well, and I think even if one doesn't agree with the outcome, one has to bear in mind that dragging it causes more damage to the institutions, leaving aside the individuals involved. Individuals may come and go but doing damage to the institutions is something that I find unfortunate."

When the Constitutional Court decided to hear the Judge President's application for leave to appeal in March 2012, Justice Jafta was already a serving member of that Court. Did the other Justices confer with him about the damage that he said would be caused to the judiciary and the JSC by dragging this matter? If they did, it appears they did not think much of that concern.

Another Justice,<sup>7</sup> who was acting in the Constitutional Court at the time of the lodging of the complaint and was also a complainant, expressed this view after the JSC's decision:

"I think in the interests of the judiciary as a whole, of the Constitutional Court and of Judge Hlophe, the chapter must be regarded as closed".

Again, the Constitutional Court appears to have ignored this view. Yet it says when referring the matter back to the JSC for trial, it does so in the interests of finality. Clearly, its decision to reopen the matter does not seem to enthuse all complainant Justices.

What's more, in papers filed at the Constitutional Court for this application for leave to appeal, a panoply of Legal Counsel retained to make legal history debated what they regarded as the vagaries of permitting a bevy of Acting Justices decide such an important case, appointed as they would be by he in whose favour the Judge President had been accused of improperly seeking to influence the Constitutional Court. This appears to be the subtext of the Court's judgment when it invokes judicial independence and separation of powers in order to avoid confronting that question head-on.<sup>8</sup> Instead, the Court elected to give a narrow interpretation to the constitutional provision about the appointment of acting judges.<sup>9</sup>

The section says:

“The President may appoint a woman or a man to be an acting judge of the Constitutional Court if there is a vacancy or if a judge is absent. The appointment must be made on the recommendation of the Cabinet member responsible for the administration of justice acting with the concurrence of the Chief Justice.”

The Constitutional Court says this section does not envisage the appointment of Acting Justices in the event of Justices of that Court recusing themselves. It says a judge who recuses himself is not “absent”; nor does the recusal bring about a “vacancy” within the meaning of the section. Blaming this on what it terms the “language, context and the scheme of the Constitution”<sup>10</sup>, it arrives at this conclusion through what I regard as a tortuous form of reasoning which goes something like this:

(1) “Absence” of a Judge Within the Meaning of s 175(1)

The Constitutional Court says although a recusal creates a “physical absence” from a particular case, it does not preclude a Constitutional Court Justice from performing “the rest of her judicial duties”<sup>11</sup> which she is required to perform. And since the act of a recusal is a performance of a judicial duty, its effect cannot therefore be considered to be an “absence”.<sup>12</sup> In other words, a Judge who recuses himself or herself from a particular case is not absent from the Court.

But this reasoning fudges the issue. The issue is not whether or not the Judges concerned are absent from the Court building and are unable to hear and consider other cases. Rather, it is whether they are absent from this case and are unable to sit in, hear and consider this case.

As it happens, the Deputy Chief Justice, Justice Nkabinde and Justice Jafta recused themselves as they appreciated that they could not sit in this case. This created a quorum problem as there were only 7 Justices available to hear the case. The Constitution requires that at least 8 Justices constitute a quorum.<sup>13</sup> Justice Zondo was then appointed as Acting Justice to make up the quorum.<sup>14</sup> From this it is clear that Acting Justices could have been appointed to hear the case in the place of the 3 remaining Justices<sup>15</sup> who lodged a complaint of gross misconduct against the Judge President.

In any event, it has been recognized by our courts that the recusal of a judicial officer results in his “absence” from the matter. In Attorney-General Transvaal v Assistant Magistrate and Others 1960 (1) SA 491 (T), it was held (per Galgut J and Maritz JP) that a magistrate’s recusal resulted in his being “absent” within the meaning of section 186(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 56 of 1955.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>14</sup> See Judge President Hlophe v Premier of the Western Cape Province; Judge President Hlophe v Freedom under Law and Others (Centre for Applied Studies and Others as Amici Curiae) 2012 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras [7] & [8]. Although para [9] of the judgment seems to suggest that Acting Justice Zondo was appointed in order to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Chief Justice Langa, it is clear from para [7] that the quorum arose when the Deputy Chief-Justice recused himself.

<sup>16</sup> That section said: “If sentence is not passed upon an accused forthwith upon his conviction in an inferior court or if, by reason of any decision or order of a superior court on appeal, review or otherwise, it is necessary to add to or vary any sentence passed in an inferior court, or

This decision was referred to with approval in S v Sindane 1962 (4) SA 79 (N), where Harcourt J (with Wessels J concurring) dealt with the phrase “in the absence of the judicial officer who convicted the accused”, and held that the “sensible interpretation” to give to the phrase was that it referred to circumstances in which the judicial officer in question “cannot continue to hear the case”. Such circumstances include those in which a magistrate had “recused himself”.<sup>17</sup>

The Constitutional Court says there is no justification for giving a different meaning to the word “absent” in s 175(1) than the ordinary meaning of “physically absent” that the word bears in s 90 and s 98 of the Constitution.<sup>18</sup>

Section 90 says an Acting President takes up that mantle when the President is out of the country, or is unable to fulfil the duties of a President, or when a vacancy has occurred in that office.<sup>19</sup> Section 98 says the functions of one cabinet member may be assigned by the President to another cabinet member if the first member is absent or unable to perform his functions.<sup>20</sup>

It is not clear to me how these provisions are comparable to a constitutional provision for the appointment of Acting Justices to the Constitutional Court. In any event, the Constitutional Court says in paragraph [34] that recusal creates “physical absence” from a particular case. At least two judgments of the High Court, which have not been overturned, say the same thing and the Constitutional Court has not faulted them in any way. That being so, the recusal of the Deputy Chief-Justice created his “physical absence” from the case and Acting Justice Zondo was appointed to make up the quorum. Similarly, the recusal of Justices Skweyiya, Van Der Westhuizen and Yacoob would have created “physical absence” and Acting Justices could have been appointed in their stead.

Then the Constitutional Court invokes the interim Constitution. It says, viewed from the prism of s 99(9) of the Interim Constitution which dealt with the appointment of Acting Judges,<sup>21</sup> the word “absent” in the Constitution (as a whole) should be interpreted narrowly to mean “physically absent” and not include temporary incapacity.<sup>22</sup> to pass sentence afresh in such court, any judicial officer of that court may, in the absence of the judicial officer who convicted the accused or passed the sentence, as the case may be, pass sentence on the accused after consideration of the evidence recorded and in the presence of the accused.” (Emphasis supplied)

<sup>19</sup> The cynical could argue (perhaps not without some justification) that there has been a virtual vacancy in the Office of the President since 2009.

“Whenever a judge of the Constitutional Court is absent or unable to perform his or her functions, or if a vacancy among the judges of the Constitutional Court arises, the President may, on the recommendation of the Minister responsible for the administration of justice made in consultation with the President of the Constitutional Court and the Chief Justice, appoint any person qualified in terms of subsection (2), as an acting judge of the Constitutional Court for the period of absence or inability of the judge concerned or until the vacancy is filled: Provided that at all times at least four judges of the Constitutional Court, including acting judges, shall be judges who have been appointed from among the judges of the Supreme Court” (emphasis in the text of the Concourt judgment)

But the Constitutional Court has itself said (at para [34]) a recusal creates “physical absence” from a particular case. In doing so it endorsed similar findings in Attorney-General Transvaal v Assistant Magistrate and Others 1960 (1) SA 491 (T) (per Galgut J and Maritz JP) and S v Sindane 1962 (4) SA 79 (N) (per Wessels et Harcourt JJ).

I pause here to point out that Galgut J and Wessels J went on to grace the Appellate Division, and Maritz J went on to serve on the Namibian Appeal Court. Thus, there is some considerable gravitas in the authority for the proposition that a recusal creates a physical absence within the meaning of s 175(1) of the Constitution, not least the Constitutional Court itself albeit somewhat diffidently.

(2) The Scope of s 175(1)

The Constitutional Court says s 175(1) is intended to deal with normal instances of vacancies and physical absence caused by ill-health, retirement, death, and periods of leave.<sup>23</sup>

There is no justification for this narrow construction of the section. Recusal from a case creates physical absence from that case within the meaning of the section. The Constitutional Court has itself said so in this same judgment. So have two High Court judgments which remain valid authority on the issue. There is no reasonable basis for limiting the meaning of “absence” to the categories identified by the Constitutional Court. On the Constitutional Court’s own say-so, it was by the Deputy Chief Justice’s recusal from this case that his physical absence gave rise to a quorum problem that was filled by an Acting Justice.<sup>24</sup>

(3) The Doctrine of Necessity

Related to s 175(1) is whether the doctrine of necessity is applicable and can be invoked in the circumstances of this case. The Constitutional Court deftly avoided that question by pointing out that the parties, including the Judge President, consented to it hearing the application for leave to appeal without delving into the merits of the appeal and then dismissed the leave to appeal application. How it could lawfully have done that without considering prospects of success on appeal is still to me a mystery that it may still clarify if a similar issue were to arise in future.

The doctrine of necessity entails that “wherever it becomes necessary for a judge to sit even where he has an interest – where no provision is made for calling another in, or where no one else can take his place – it is his duty to hear and decide, however disagreeable it may be”.<sup>25</sup>

But the difference between the position in the United States and that in South Africa is that we have a constitutional provision that allows for the appointment of Acting Justices. The United States does not. So, the proviso that necessitates a disqualified Judge nonetheless hearing a case in which he has an interest, “where no provision is made for calling another in, or where no one else can take his place”, does not apply in South Africa because there is indeed such a provision in our Constitution. It is to be found in s 175(1).

(4) Section 175(2)

Then the Constitutional Court says under s 175(2) of the Constitution, acting judges may be appointed to other Courts without a vacancy or absence of a permanent judge in those Courts having arisen.<sup>26</sup>

Amici Curiae) 2012 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras [7] & [8].

Since this observation appears to justify the appointment of Acting Justices, even in the absence of a vacancy, than to refute it, it is not clear to me how s 175(2) advances the Constitutional Court's reasoning against the appointment of Acting Justices in the circumstances of this case.

(5) Threat to Judicial Independence

The Constitutional Court then says potential danger to judicial independence and the separation of powers is ever present in the appointment of individual Judges to hear a specific case.<sup>27</sup>

But this remark assumes (without apparent justification) that pliant Judges may be appointed by the President as Acting Justices to decide the merits of the appeal between the Judge-President on the one hand, and Freedom under Law and the Western Cape Premier on the other, in a particular predetermined way. This ignores the presumption of impartiality in a Judge about which Ngcobo CJ famously said the following:<sup>28</sup>

[31] The presumption of impartiality is implicit, if not explicit, in the office of a judicial officer. This presumption must be understood in the context of the oath of office that judicial officers are required to take, as well as the nature of the judicial function. Judicial officers are required by the Constitution to apply the Constitution and the law 'impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice'. Their oath of office requires them to 'administer justice to all persons alike without fear, favour or prejudice, in accordance with the Constitution and the law'. And the requirement of impartiality is also implicit, if not explicit, in s 34 of the Constitution which guarantees the right to have disputes decided 'in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum'. This presumption therefore flows directly from the Constitution.

[32] As is apparent from the Constitution, the very nature of the judicial function requires judicial officers to be impartial. Therefore, the authority of the judicial process depends upon the presumption of impartiality. As Blackstone aptly observed, '(t)he law will not suppose a possibility of bias or favour in a judge, who [has] already sworn to administer impartial justice, and whose authority greatly depends upon that presumption and idea'. And, as this court observed in SARFU II, judicial officers, through their training and experience, have the ability to carry out their oath of office, and it 'must be assumed that they can disabuse their minds of any irrelevant personal beliefs and predispositions'. Hence the presumption of impartiality."

So, there was no potential danger to judicial independence and the separation of powers if Acting Justices were appointed to hear the merits of the appeal in this case. The Constitution confers the power to appoint Constitutional Court Acting Justices on the President. South Africans (wisely or otherwise) invested their trust in the President to exercise that power with integrity. It is not the province of the Constitutional Court to question that trust by invoking alleged danger to judicial independence in the event of the President exercising his constitutional power to appoint Acting Justices. Either the conferment of the power to appoint Acting Justices in the Constitutional Court gives rise to a potential danger to judicial independence or it does not. That danger should not depend upon the identity of the President exercising that power.

What's more, the Constitutional Court cannot assume (as it seems to have done) that whichever Acting Justices are appointed by the President to hear the case will not do so impartially.

D AUTOMATIC DISQUALIFICATION

But in all its reasoning, the Constitutional Court misses one fundamental point. The circumstances of this case called not for a recusal of the Justices who want the Judge President removed as a judge.<sup>29</sup> The circumstances of this case called for the automatic disqualification of those Justices. This principle, and the circumstances giving rise to it, were explained by the House of Lords in R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate and others, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No2) [1999] 1 All ER 577 (HL) in these terms (at 586):

"The fundamental principle is that a man may not be a judge in his own cause. This principle, as developed by the courts, has two very similar but not identical implications. First it may be applied literally: if a judge is in fact a party to the litigation or has a financial or proprietary interest in its outcome then he is indeed sitting as a judge in his own cause. In that case, the mere fact that he is a party to the action or has a financial or proprietary interest in its outcome is sufficient to cause his automatic disqualification. The second application of the principle is where a judge is not a party to the suit and does not have a financial interest in its outcome, but in some other way his conduct or behaviour may give rise to a suspicion that he is not impartial, for example because of his friendship with a party. This second type of case is not strictly speaking an application of the principle that a man must not be judge in his own cause, since the judge will not normally be himself benefiting, but providing a benefit for another by failing to be impartial.

In my judgment, this case falls within the first category of case, viz where the judge is disqualified because he is a judge in his own cause. In such a case, once it is shown that the judge is himself a party to the cause, or has a relevant interest in its subject matter, he is disqualified without any investigation into whether there was a likelihood or suspicion of bias."

The three Justices of the Constitutional Court who were part of the bench that sat in judgment of the Judge President's application for leave to appeal had approached the JSC and lay a complaint against the Judge President that he attempted improperly to influence the Constitutional Court. By adjudicating the Judge President's application for leave to appeal, and refusing it, they ensured that their own complaint against the Judge President will be re-opened by the JSC (despite Justice Jafta – one of their number – saying he considered the matter finalised by the JSC and that "it would not be wise for anyone to reopen the matter"); they ensured that the Judge President may be removed as a judge on the strength of their evidence against him.

In these circumstances, the three Justices should have realised that they would be "sitting as judges in [their] own cause" and were thus automatically disqualified from hearing the application. The Judge President's acquiescence in their hearing the application for leave to appeal did not absolve them from exercising their own judgment and disqualify themselves for the same reason that Justice Nkabinde, Justice Jafta and the Deputy Chief Justice withdrew from hearing the case. Whether the Judge President was satisfied that they would not be biased against him is irrelevant because they are automatically disqualified and so the enquiry as regards "reasonable apprehension of bias" does not even arise.

But to disqualify themselves automatically would have been to acknowledge that lodging a collective complaint as Justices of the Constitutional Court (and not as individuals) more than four years ago<sup>30</sup> was a recipe for a potential constitutional crisis. Because they denied this on affidavit, and in argument through their counsel, it would not do to disqualify themselves on the ground that they were seriously conflicted. So, they didn't. Expedience trumped the Rule of Law and, at least ostensibly, a crisis was averted.

E CONCLUSION

So, in conclusion, I leave you with this question: When expedience trumps the Rule of Law at the highest judicial level in a case like this, to whom does the ordinary citizen turn?

Many thanks for your audience.
